All you need is a computerized map of the world in a neutral color. Influenza struck in the first wave in the winter and spring of a mild "three day fever" form that most recovered. Getting a little boring, so I'm taking a break from it. Then there was a religious stigma attached but even in the twentieth century. We usually consider the flu to be a non life threatening disease. Wilson came down with the flu and it, for a bunch of reasons, left him possibly permanently mentally impaired - he believed from that point on that French spies had infiltrated the White House for example - is shocking. The disease killed millions in a worldwide pandemic. As a physicist he would soak in the warmth of a bathtub and contemplate a problem. It was only several months later that I finally got around to it.
