The depiction in the 12th-century English Eadwine Psalter has a naked female swimmer in the Finding the River, holding the empty ark with one hand, while a clothed female with her feet in the water holds out the baby to the princess, who reclines on a bed or litter. There is a 12th-century cycle in stained glass in the Basilica of Saint-Denis which includes it. A painting by Bonifazio de' Pitati of was perhaps the first large and elaborate treatment of the subject to concentrate on a larger Finding the River group, entirely using carefully depicted contemporary costumes; he painted at least one smaller similar version of the subject.

In addition, child abandonment remained a significant social issue in the period, with Finding the River hospitalsorphanages specifically for abandoned children, a common focus of charitable activity by the rich. As well as the Catholic countries, there were also a number of versions in Dutch Golden Age paintingwhere the Old Testament subject was considered unobjectionable, orphanages were run by boards of "regents" drawn from the local wealthy, and the story of Moses was also given contemporary political significance.
