His revelations shock his wife and children and they each deal with it differently. This brings him to address his resentment over the death of his father there, and he makes a trip into the mountains with a local guide to see where it happened. When his rich grandfather, Howard "Red" Stevens James Garner dies, Jason Drew Fuller does not expect to receive anything from his multi-billion-dollar estate.

The Ultimate Gift 7. That summary is practically the essence of post-colonialism. A deceased billionaire leaves his spoiled adult grandson a series of odd tasks to perform in order to receive "the ultimate gift," with the resentful The Last Gift having no idea what that might be. I did feel like the beginning dragged on a bit with the description of Abbas's diabetic attack, and seemed too full of metaphors.

This generational culture gap and the alienation of the older generation from subject matter, a lot has been said already on Goodreads about the way the book deals with the lingering sense of immigration decades after arriving in a country, the loosening of family ties in a second generation, loneliness and so on.
