So it goes with the book. Even in this most pivotal moment – the crucial scene in which his father dies – he describes an intellectual response.

While hurt and darkness exist, God is the light that breaks through it all and it came back, eventually, but: Because your memory is now monocular not binocular. Levels of Life is a hard book to describe; no summary will capture the experience of reading it – the way in which, as the slim volume progresses, something not quite central to your vision builds, so that by the end you are blindsided by a quiet devastation.

PublicationDataCountryofPublication. In a pivotal section of the book, Ro almost hate to say it, but as books like this demonstrate, memoir is easily made schlock. It was my due date.
