One particular difference is that English allows for prepositional particles to move to either side of the object of the verb as in She picked up the book, She picked the book up. As with adjectives which allow for CP clauses, these nouns are limited in number and relate to mental states and ideas. While Japanese, as we saw, prefers complement to precede the head while English prefers the head to precede the complement. Jeanne laisse son argent filer. C is sometimes a position filled by conjunctions as we saw with in subordinate clauses and sometimes filled by relative pronouns as in this example.
