Far from the perfect knight he thought himself to be, he remains a humbled, contrite, yet redeemed man at the end of the story. Gawain returns to Camelot wearing the girdle as a token of his failure to keep his promise.

Thus, ascribing authorship to John Massey is still controversial and most certainly not to the author of the original text. King Arthur, however, refuses to eat until he has witnessed something marvelous or heard a great adventure story. King Arthur arranged a great feast at All Saints Eve to send off his knight.

In one hand he held a green holly bough and in the other, a huge razor sharp paxe. The lord's wife entered Gawain's bedchamber as .
