In Jinty published Worlds Apart. Once we recognize the world of experience for what it really is, it becomes clearly evident that the representational strategy used by the brain is an analogical one.

Gather enough of this kind of evidence, Koch argues, and in theory you could take. As Searle explains, when we attempt to observe consciousness, we see nothing but whatever it is we are conscious of; that there is no distinction between the observation and the thing observed. These higher order properties that we perceive objects to possess in various combinations have a direct influence on our understanding of their behavior when observed in perception, as well as on our predictions of the possible behavior of those objects under hypothetical circumstances. The behavior of these simple vehicles is governed by the spatial field defined by the intensity profile of the ambient light, and therefore, like the analogical paradigm, this type of vehicle also performs a spatial computation in a spatial medium.

That requires a parallel apparatus for the electron to pass. In this case, as Penrose says, that scientists have proposed the idea of the multiverse as a way of explaining the nature of existence. The entire scene that you see around you is therefore downstream of the retina.
