Family conduct is significant in the class, racial, and cultural dimensions of the colonial community between the late nineteenth century and decolonization in Buettner focuses on the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries, after the invention of the steamship and the building of the Suez Canal allowed for easier travel between Britain and India, facilitating the establishment of British family life in India.

He is critical of the racism that many Indian arrivals faced and notes that the arguments complement the sections in Buettner's book that describe where returning Britons settled—on the seaside where a seasonal population that was firmly middle-class tended to go. Some of the health concerns do seem legitimate—for instance, the concern that Indian servants mixed unboiled water with milk for the children.
