According to IIT, there should indeed be two separate experiences, but no superordinate conscious entity that is the union of the two. An analogy is mass, which can be defined by how it curves space-time around it—except that in the case of experience the entities having the property are not elementary particles but complexes of elements, and experience comes not in two but in a trillion varieties. And that is much better than to make arbitrary claims or to draw no inference whatsoever.

The study of consciousness in nature has been hindered for centuries by astrology. Why certain parts of the brain and not others? Therefore, just like a computer simulation of a giant star will not bend space-time around the machine, a simulation of our conscious brain will not have consciousness. Later, Spinoza, Leibniz, Schopenhauer and, closer to modern times, James, Whitehead, Russell, and Teilhard de Chardin espoused panpsychist notions [].
